Corporal punishment in Singaporean Schools

Introduction

Schools are the social institutions that are traditionally concerned with the role of the transfer of knowledge besides other aspects of culture to upcoming generations. Knowledge may involve skills and manners that enable individuals to function in society. As a social institution, the school performs the function of developing an all rounded person for the welfare of the society (Loo and Yam 138). The functionality of individuals involves their cultural induction that consequently involves the instillation of virtues that the society cherishes. Besides, it also involves the condemnation of vices that the society perceives as detrimental. Violence is one of the vices condemned across diverse cultures. The school as a social institution is expected to train individuals who later co-exist in a society free of violence.
